Development of the metacarpus. The mammalian metacarpus is not a bone that is usually described as a growth plate or a member of the digit, but a combination of both. The bones of the metacarpus are formed in the second phalangeal epiphysis, which is not a true growth plate. In the developing fetus, the first three phalanges of the digits are perforated by several small holes and form the fetal web space. This is known as the handplate. These are among the earliest bones to form in the hand and usually separate the digits. The fetal handplate is responsible for forming the flexor and extensor retinaculum. The distal phalanx begins to grow early in development and the furrows that correspond to the growth spurs become more prominent as the handplate is displaced proximally. The digit plate does not normally fuse with the handplate, although some of the interdigitations may fuse together to form a web space. This web space may then be seen as an indication of disease processes in the hand, such as arthritis. As the digit plate becomes more complex and grows, the epiphysis lengthens and acquires longitudinally orientated cartilaginous zones known as the anterior and posterior interdigitations. As the epiphysis lengthens, it begins to perforate the phalangeal heads with small holes (Haversian foramina) and then perforates the base of the bone itself (Haversian canals).Which is the fifth biggest value?
